Peter H. Green

Member of Distinction

Peter Green, a writer, architect and city planner reared in a family of journalists, found his father's 400 World War II letters, his humorous war stories, his mother's writings and his family's often hilarious doings too good a tale to keep to himself, so he launched a second career as a writer. After years of proposal writing for his design firms, he went back to Washington University to study creative writing with such published authors as Catherine Rankovic, Robert Earleywine and Rick Skwiot and released Dad's War with the United States Marines, James A. Rock & Co., publisher, Seaboard Press (Florence, SC) in 2005.

Peter is currently tackling the mystery genre as he continues to introduce new readers to the often comical antics and serious achievements of his dad's World War II adventure. In his debut novel, Crimes of Design, an architect discovers the body of the staunchest advocate for his controversial flood-protected dream project in the site's storm water pumping station during a record flood in St. Louis. Currently on publisher submission, this is the first of the Patrick MacKenna mystery series. Samples of Peter's work can be found on his website: www.peterhgreen.com
